#aapor like differentiate landlines from cell, when we will split smartphones form reg. cell given the capabilities and are increasingly engaging in activities that are associated with measurement error (see AAPOR 2010b). But there is a larger change underway in how mobile devices are being used that suggest more challenges ahead for survey researchers. Mobile phones are much more than voice-based communication devices, various forms of short message service (SMS, instant messaging, or text messaging) are gaining ground, as are Web-based services for mobile phones. The idea of a device (telephone) implying a particular medium of communication (voice) no longer has traction. The range of modes of communication for mobile devices is rapidly expanding. Smart mobile telephones can already deal with voice (both human and automated), text (also both human- and computer-generated), visual material (both the delivery of photographs and videos to mobile devices and the capture and transmission of such images from the device), spatial positioning (e.g., GPS), weather data, building in
